...more exalted then, must their happiness be, who enjoy this glorious commerce, with an unlimited confidence, founded upon such a reciprocal union of affections, as excludes all possibility of suspicion, and adds a security to their joys: In this glorious situation, the soul enlarges its dominion, and as the most sublime idea of human felicity is, when the mind leaves the confines of this body, so true friendship gives us a glimmering of those immortal transports in another life, whilst it affords so perfect a satisfaction here, in the transition of the soul (as it were) to another person; the pleasures of this invaluable virtue are finely expressed by Horace, in his complaints for the loss of a friend, who was most dear to him.

Illam meæ si partem animæ tulit,
Maturior vis, quid moror altera,
Nec charius æquo nec superstes
Integer? Ille dies utramque
Duxit ruinam.----------
